My friend recently told me about a production environment at his company that's literally a de-facto 2nd generation garbage collected language: The code is almost 100% of the time running on Python with a memory-management strategy that allocates memory in the same way how it behaves in C. It uses the memory manager of the language, and nothing further. It operates at the level of granularity where Python's memory manager allocates memory from the operating system. He said he noticed very little performance impact, and that the focus was on software engineering rather than cpu performance. Do you know of any company that has ported its production application to be garbage collected? Could you name a few? A: I would not call this garbage-collection. I would call it: compact-unlive-island, or simply live object,
